What the docents are currently teaching about the piece.

In 19th century, women were not part of the great enthusiasm for landscape painting, but in the twentieth and twenty-first century women reclaimed it. The artist worked outside, en plein air, directly in contact with the landscape of Northern New Mexico and had a bold, expressive style: using palette knives and masonry trowels.

Results, or what the docents can add to their lesson about this painting.

The historical and current trauma of the indigenous lives lost due to the uranium mines and the unfinished business of decontamination of the land is all ours. As we work toward a decolonized world, this piece is not just a tribute to the beauty of the land, but is also an opportunity for a renewed discussion about reversing the damage to the land of the Diné. It is important to continue the work of honoring the Treaty of 1868 to ensure the thriving of the Diné - and all indigenous people - in contemporary society.

FUTURE WORK:

This NCUIRE project was a preparation for a National Endowment for the Humanities grant application that will be submitted in June 2021.
